Two Poems by Athena Kildegaard

"Fake Ambassadors of a Fake Unknown"

—René Magritte

Some things we know: that our fingernails grow and grow, that we lose strength as we age, etcetera. These are physical evidences of a quantifiable world. And some things are unknown and may remain so forever. For example, what was the first word ever spoken by Homo sapiens sapiens?

"Yes?" "No?" Or "eat," "shit." "Good?" "Me?" "Me?"

And surely there are things we don't know but that we will no doubt find out. How to die. When tomorrow's headache will pass. So, the unknown unknowns, as a man in a gray suit once enunciated. Those will remain buried. For now, let a beautiful woman wearing almost nothing jump out of a cake. We'll eat with our hands.

Prairie Lament

Grain elevators connect sky to ground.

Our eyes seek out
these monoliths

of metal and square letters and do not move beyond them.

Grain elevators

leave nothing to the imagination.
They are

unrooted and do not blossom.
They presume.

And we are fattened by them into complacency.
