Three Poems by Iris Jamahl Dunkle

Free to Rise

About the sky, I have some opinions; pin-pricked utterances that sharpen in to night sky. Had I freedom to rise, I would hot-balloon out of this far-off field.
What wonders would I see as I rose? Barn, field, cursive of trees, roads that shoot out like gray meteors. Then a map that's hedged by serpentine of river, hunger of sea.
And me, rising in my crazy orbiting.

Had I not swallowed stones as ballast or worn the leaden moonboots of grief, my myth may have been found: stitched from the distance and time that always pulls between stars.

Altered State

The first days after you died sunk like stones.
Sky too cornflower blue to stand under.

I sat, a dormant weed in a dry field, waiting for the warm wind to rattle me.

I followed orders. Sit. Breathe. Stand. Breathe. Sign here. Decided which parts of your body you wanted to give away (eyes, skin, heart).

What you would wear into the roar and fury of that last fire that would consume you.

What color of glass box you would want to encase your ashes underground (something the color of the deep sea). While the days lumbered forward like giant dogs and the world hummed too loudly. An apocalypse of bees.

Measures of Grace

I count my breath in shifts of eight: in and out and in and out. Breath held and expelled like raw sea blooms of ghostly jellyfish propelling underwater. In one angle, I am looking for God: blue sky pressing down like a terrible sea I am under. Don't rise too fast, or you'll get the bends. In the other angle, I am looking for the direction of grace without compass. How to fold the two together without losing the propulsion of now? What strange blooms will spin out, and spark fur of fire, before I face myself in the mirror?
