

Nativity Scene [1]

May 18, 2020 Writing and Faith [2]

Featured Poetry [3]

Poem by Lynn Domina

Nativity Scene

after Beryl Cook

No one has told the child
he is naked, so he stretches his absurd arms toward floating cherubs. He is huge, unnatural. His weighty thighs would cascade over my hands if I tried to hold him,
though his mother looks unfazed,

Nativity Scene

Published on Talking Writing (<https://mail.talkingwriting.com>)

propping him on her knees as if oblivious to messages of his divine paternity. Everyone—angels, baby, mother—flashes red hair, which I dislike, as I dislike their blank expressions and poor muscle tone. I chastise myself for my harsh judgment, vow to love at least the sheep, the hungry ox, the curious donkey. Not one creature gazes out toward me, solitary observer, fearful
of their lighthearted play.

Art Information

- “A Flock of Winged Cherubs in the Sky, One Holding a Martyr's Palm [4]” © Giovanni Domenico Tiepolo; public domain.

Lynn Domina is the author of two collections of poetry, Corporal Works (Four Way Books, 1995) and Framed in Silence (Main Street Rag, 2011). She is the editor of a collection of essays, Poets on the Psalms (Trinity University Press, 2011). Her recent work appears or is forthcoming in Nimrod, Alaska Quarterly Review, Kenyon Review, and other periodicals and anthologies. She currently serves as creative writing editor at The Other Journal and is head of the English Department at Northern Michigan University.

Source URL: <https://mail.talkingwriting.com/nativity-scene>

Links:

[1] <https://mail.talkingwriting.com/nativity-scene>

[2] <https://mail.talkingwriting.com/tw-issue-themes/writing-and-faith>

[3] <https://mail.talkingwriting.com/talkingwriting-categories/featured-poetry>

[4] https://commons.wikimedia.org/wiki/File:A_Flock_of_Winged_Cherubs_in_the_Sky,_One_Holding_a_Martyr%27s_Palm_MET_SF-1975-1-486.jpg

Nativity Scene

Published on Talking Writing (<https://mail.talkingwriting.com>)
